In the last monthly report of the state board of health Dr Lindsley says, in discussing the question: "What Is a Public Funeral?" "that the phraseology is unfortunate and open to criticism, because the expression 'public funeral' is a misuse of words, and therefore the words being wrongly employed carry with them a wrong meaning. It would be better if the law was expressed thus: There will be no funeral; or, there shall be no public burial of any person dead from small-pox, etc. The obvious object in making such a regulation is, to reduce to the minimum, the risk of spreading infection. The best means of doing this are by disinfection and isola-tion. If isolation of the patient was necessary before death, the isolation of the body is no less so after death. If if was important to prohibit visitors to the sick person and even to the house in which he was sick, lest the infection might be carried from the infected hings therein, it is not the less important to exclude visitors from the infect-ed house after death, and until the processes of purification be completed. It teed not be understood, however, to prohibit a clergyman from holding any brief religious service, if it would be a consolation to the friends, in the infected house, in the presence only of those who have already been exposed old method of a fixed guarantee was the those who have already been exposed by living in the house, previded no others are admitted, and provided always that the clergyman himself take all nece-sary precautions against spread-little, however, and seemed inclined to
